

Help build a climate literate world

Whether considering which crops to plant, how to reduce the carbon emissions of a city's transportation system, or whether to bring an umbrella along for the daily commute, we all interact with climate. Responding to and managing our influence on climate impacts is a major challenge for society, today and for centuries to come.

Climanosco was born of the vision that we can all play a part in addressing this challenge – and that a first step towards doing so is to make the best knowledge about climate science accessible to everyone.

Every year, scientific literature publishes over 15,000 new climate research articles. This research is vital in creating informed, interconnected and viable solutions for climate challenges that impact us all. Yet, due to its technical nature, it is inaccessible to the vast majority of people.

Climanosco is leading the way by publishing state-of-the-art, peer reviewed climate research articles that have been edited for a broad audience. Articles are written and reviewed by climate researchers, and authors are supported in adjusting text for greater accessibility by reviewers with diverse backgrounds.

Founded in 2015, Climanosco is an independent non-profit association, an online library, and, most importantly, a growing community of engaged citizens and scientists from around the world.

We have already published one collection of accessible, peer-reviewed research articles, with two more collections set to be published in 2018. All Climanosco's content is freely available via our online library.

Climanosco fosters collaborative, community-driven connections between society and science. Our forum offers a space where citizens and scientists come together to ask questions, share ideas and together shape and enhance the conversation on climate science research.

To continue our work, we need your financial support.

Since inception, we have set the foundation for Climanosco's vision, establishing our 'call for manuscripts' process, publishing the first contents of our library, expanding our network by actively reaching out to scientists and schools, and enhancing our online presence with a more user-friendly website. From this foundation, we are poised to further expand our offering and reach. Upcoming projects include:

- Three calls for manuscripts, during which scientists paraphrase cutting edge climate research for a broad audience, including one event for students ages 14 – 17,
- expansion of our online library with blogs, interviews and videos,
- local outreach including presenting at schools and prototyping a research program in dialogue with local communities,
- developing a dedicated dialogue forum on climanosco.org.

This whole month of December, Climanosco is raising funds to support these activities. As an independent non-profit organization, we are exclusively financed by capped donations, and we keep overhead costs as low as possible to ensure funding is used efficiently as we help open climate science to the world. We believe that when people are empowered with knowledge, they are better able to address climate challenges in their communities. Your donation directly helps build a more climate literate world. This holiday season, we invite you to support Climanosco and give the gift of knowledge.

Please visit climanosco.org/give to learn more, or contact us at give@climanosco.org.